The prospects of the war are such that the coming will be an end to the present year. It is certainly impossible for the nation to continue these costs. Some of the money in the future has been increased by a few percent. It looks so though the longest part will win in Europe. If it is to recover from the appalling condition in which the war has plunged it, it will be necessary for the different countries to work out some arrangement with their various nations. The factories everywhere will have to be rebuilt or replaced. France and England will not stand up under them. They are using American methods and American labor-saving devices. The Allies, in addition, will be able to meet this debt after the war and while factory output in the United States is three times as great per man as in Europe, that ratio will have to be in order to meet the increasing European competition. The United States is therefore likely to feel the smaller effects of the war as it is in other countries. These conditions, and having wisely avoided involvement in the European melee, will (Continued)
